Last month, the Michigan State University Board of Trustees approved more than $45 million in university funding for renovations and upgrades for buildings across the campus, including $3 million for new solar panels for the David A. Clarke School of Law building. “One of the original considerations we had was to find a way to bring solar power to the school,” Trustees Chair Mark Hollis said. “MSU is one of the largest employers in West Lansing and the student body is an economic engine. The more energy efficient we make buildings, the more energy efficient we make the campus, the better.” The $3 million addition is part of a $27.7 million federal stimulus package approved last month by the U.S. Department of Energy that the school will use to install solar panels on the roof of the East Hall of the law school building. The money comes from a grant Michigan has been awarded as part of an initiative to make school buildings more energy efficient. Department of Energy grant awards are designed to help schools and universities deploy sustainable building energy systems to improve their buildings and create jobs. The program is part of President Barack Obama’s $787 billion stimulus package. Michigan State is one of 15 recipients of the 2011 Sustainability Energy Efficiency Partnership grant awards, which are projected to create 11,000 jobs over three years, according to a release from the department. The release said the projects will create “direct and indirect employment opportunities” for more than 350 people. The grant will also allow MSU to upgrade the energy efficiency of the East Hall to meet 2010 federal guidelines, Hollis said. The $3 million set aside will allow the building to be retrofitted with new solar panels and an efficient cooling system to boost energy savings. The $27.7 million Michigan State University receives from the federal grant is being awarded as part of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act, the same economic stimulus bill that will pay for nearly $2 billion in roads, bridges and other projects across Michigan
