Among numerous genera of carotenoids that are found in foods and natural products, is that of the β-carotene family. β-Carotene is mainly found in food products such as fruits and vegetables, and is generally produced by extraction from natural sources using chemical processes. Other carotenoids with similar structure include α-carotene and β-carotene isomer 2. β-Carotene has numerous health benefits including prevention and treatment of chronic diseases, cancer prevention and treatment, protection against oxidative stress, absorption of vitamin A, and the treatment of vitamin A deficiencies. Among other characteristics of β-carotene are its antioxidant and anti-inflammatory properties, which are attributed to the ability of β-carotene to react with the free radical, singlet oxygen. Due to these properties and to the positive effects of β-carotene on human health, the search for further natural sources of β-carotene and other carotenoids has increased in recent years. Various carotenogenic microorganisms have been isolated and identified as capable of producing carotenoids. Known sources of natural carotenoids are due to the genetic engineering of microorganisms. Microorganisms which have been shown to produce carotenoids include Escherichia coli, Erwinia herbicola, Erwinia uredovora, Pseudomonas sp., Serratia marcescens, Arthrobacter globiformis and many others. Interest in carotenoids has increased due to their various biological functions. For instance, they serve as pigments, flavoring agents, and antioxidant agents. Furthermore, due to the lipophilic nature of carotenoids, they are currently being investigated as potential anticancer agents and as nutritional supplements. The major carotenoids found in nature include β-carotene, lycopene and lutein. Although β-carotene is the most popularly reported pigments from microbial sources, due to its poor bioavailability in the body, the high production costs and the difficulty to be isolated from natural sources, there is still a need in the art to find alternative sources of β-carotene and carotenoids, and particularly the direct production of pharmaceutical grade β-carotene. Accordingly, there is a need for an improved microbial host cell for high yield production of carotenoids, especially β-carotene, and other carotenoids

Treatment of symptomatic bladder instability in children: a preliminary report. Eleven children, ranging from 3 to 14 years of age, were treated for symptoms of urinary incontinence resulting from bladder instability. In all cases, the symptoms were refractory to conservative treatment and were eliminated by transurethral coagulation of the detrusor muscle, using a urethral catheter. The children were followed for 6 to 52 months after the procedure. All but one child were found to have improved postoperatively with urinary continence maintained. A postoperative bladder infection occurred in two patients, resulting in recurrent incontinence, and both required a second urethral catheterization. Our experience with the transurethral coagulation of the detrusor muscle as a palliative procedure for the treatment of symptomatic bladder instability in the pediatric patient is presented.Q: How can I convert my python script to a windows executable? I made a script in python that runs on mac and windows (and linux) but I've never used pyinstaller before and have made a few mistakes with it already so I can't use it right now. I added a shebang line to the beginning of my script and I edited the code to fit it. I tried adding a hashbang to the beginning of my script and I tried using this website to convert the file to windows executables. When I use my script the result is a series of zeros when it opens.
