While the $5.9 billion announcement has been widely reported in the news media, the deal's financial terms have not been disclosed, and according to sources, the transaction is still subject to private equity funder Blackstone's approval. The deal could be announced as early as this week. However, the financial terms of the deal may be even more complicated than the press reports suggest. The sources that I have talked with for the past few weeks say that it is unlikely the deal is worth in excess of $2 billion, which is the reported purchase price. Many of the same sources are adamant that the deal does not include the eBay's Photobucket units, and that the acquisition is strictly for the Shopzilla and Web-in-a-Box businesses. Sources close to eBay tell me that the purchase is part of an aggressive attack on private search, specifically Shopping.com, at the same time that the company is trying to find ways to grow its Marketplaces unit. Some sources say that the search unit is growing faster than eBay, and that the balance sheet is healthy. Those inside sources believe that the deal, which also includes a $100 million payout to eBay's shareholders, is a means to help eBay clear real estate it owns in the heart of San Francisco's South of Market (SoMa). If the deal goes through, the eBay would then have a good stream of cash to take to the eventual public offering. With the pending deal, many observers wonder if eBay is preparing for a public offering. I am told that this is not the case. An IPO would have to wait until the company is able to show a more vibrant growth trajectory. Beyond the private search and the eBay-Blackstone deal is the ongoing debate over the role of the major global portals, particularly Yahoo. According to sources that a681f4349e
